Of Mice and Men

AUTHOR BIO

Full Name: John Steinbeck
Date of Birth: 1902
Place of Birth: Salinas, California
Date of Death: 1968
Brief Life Story: John Steinbeck grew up in and around Salinas, California. Steinbeck's comfortable California upbringing instilled in him a love of nature and the land, but also of the diverse ethnic and socioeconomic groups featured throughout his fiction. He attended Stanford University, but never completed his degree. Instead he moved to New York in 1925 to become a freelance writer. He returned to California after that plan failed and earned his first real recognition for Tortilla Flat (1935), a collection of stories about peasant workers in Monterrey, California. He published many more novels throughout his lifetime and today is best known for the novella Of Mice and Men and the novel The Grapes of Wrath (1939). He won the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1962 and died six years later.

HISTORICAL AND LITERARY CONTEXT

When Published: 1937
Literary Period: Modernist Novel
Related Literary Works: John Steinbeck and Woody Guthrie were perhaps the two most famous chroniclers of the Great Depression. Steinbeck's trilogy of novels portraying the struggle of migrant workers in California is the most enduring literary chronicle of the Great Depression: In Dubious Battle (1936), Of Mice and Men (1937), and The Grapes of Wrath (1940). Woody Guthrie (1912–1967), the leading American songwriter of the late 1930s and 1940s, released the Dust Bowl Ballads in 1940, an album of songs inspired by the drought-ravaged region of the American West that came to be known as the “Dust Bowl” in the early 1930s.

Related Historical Events: When the stock market crashed in 1929, an already awful situation for farmers and farm workers got considerably worse. Following World War I, crop prices plunged, forcing farmers to expand their farms and buy more equipment to make up for the shortfall. This situation was exacerbated when a severe drought crippled much of the American West. So when the market crashed, farmers could not pay back the debts they had built up in buying more land and equipment. As a result, many farmers and farm workers, migrated to California in hopes of finding enough work to live.

PLOT SUMMARY

Near the Salinas River in California, George Milton and Lennie Small, two migrant farm workers, walk toward a ranch. George is quick and smart, while Lennie is huge, strong, and mentally disabled. As they make their way to the ranch, George often whines that his life would be so much easier without Lennie. But when Lennie offers to leave him, George refuses. They bed down for the night, and George describes the farm that he and Lennie one day dream of owning together. George also reminds Lennie of the trouble Lennie got into at their last ranch and tells Lennie that if he gets into trouble again, he should hide at this spot where they’re sleeping.

George and Lennie arrive at the ranch the next morning. There they meet Candy, an old handyman with only one hand, and the boss, who questions George and Lennie about their skills. The boss is skeptical when George answers for Lennie, but gives them work despite his suspicions. The men also meet Curley, the boss’s ill-tempered and violent son, and, later, Curley’s sexy wife, who likes to flirt with the ranch hands. Finally, George and Lennie meet Slim and Carlson. Slim’s dog has just given birth, and Carlson wants to replace Candy’s old, useless dog with one of the puppies.

After their first day of work, Slim gives a puppy to an overjoyed Lennie, and George tells Slim about what happened to him and Lennie at the ranch in Weed: Lennie touched a woman’s dress and the woman accused him of rape. Slim voices his appreciation of the deep and selfless friendship between George and Lennie. Carlson, meanwhile, convinces Candy to let him shoot his dog. Carlson takes the dog outside and shoots it in the back of the head to make sure it doesn’t suffer, but Candy still seems upset. When Lennie once again asks George to describe the farm they’ll someday own, Candy overhears and asks if he can help them buy it. A few minutes later, Curley enters and the other men tease him about his wife. Curley mistakenly thinks Lennie is also laughing at him, so he punches Lennie. Lennie doesn’t fight back until George says it’s all right. Then Lennie catches Curley’s hand and breaks it.

All of the men except Crooks, Lennie, and Candy go to visit a brothel on Saturday night. Though at first Crooks, a black man, refuses to talk to the white men, after a while they all end up talking about Lennie and George’s farm. Crooks claims it will never work out. The conversation ends when Curley’s wife enters. She mocks the men as weak and says she’s so lonely that she’s stooped to talking to them. When they tell her to leave, she threatens to have Crooks lynch.

The next afternoon, Lennie sits alone, consoling himself after accidentally killing his puppy. Curley’s wife, lonely and desperate, sits beside him. She tells him of her failed dream of being an actress and offers to let Lennie touch her hair. But Lennie strokes it too hard. She tries to push him away, Lennie panics and shakes her, breaking her neck. Lennie flees to the spot by the river. Candy discovers Curley’s wife’s body and alerts George. Curley leads a group of men to lynch Lennie, but George directs the men to the wrong place and finds Lennie first. As he once more describes the farm they’re going to own and Lennie loses himself in imagination, George shoot Lennie in the back of the head with Carlson’s gun. The men come running. George says he killed Lennie in a struggle for Carlson’s gun. Slim tells George he did what he had to do.

CHARACTERS

George Milton – George is Lennie’s friend and protector. Unlike the giant, lumbering Lennie, George is small and wiry with a quick and resourceful mind. In many ways, George is a typical migrant farm worker, a class of poor and lonely men who traveled from ranch to ranch looking for work during the Great Depression. But George differs from these often bitter men because of his friendship with Lennie, which keeps him, in his own words, from getting “mean.” Though George sometimes resents Lennie as a burden, he also deeply loves him, and shares with him a dream of owning their own farm.

Lennie Small – George’s companion. Lennie is huge and immensely strong, but a mental disability makes him entirely dependent on George, especially after his Aunt Clara dies (before the novella begins). Lennie is the most innocent, gentle, and kind character in the novel, and his sole dream is to tend rabbits. and live off the “fatta the lan’” on a farm that he and George will own. In the end, Lennie and his innocent dream fall prey to Curley’s revenge and George’s mercy, two powerful adult emotions beyond Lennie’s control or comprehension.

Candy – An old handyman who greets George and Lennie at the ranch. The owner of an old and feeble dog, Candy is himself crippled—he lost his hand in an accident on the ranch. Candy is a man who has been broken by life in general and the Depression in particular, and he is desperate for some hope or dream to believe in. He therefore latches onto George and Lennie’s plan to buy a farm, and offers his life savings to help them.

Curley – The son of the boss of the ranch, Curley is careful to make it clear that he is of a higher class than the other ranch hands by wearing fancy boots. He is also mean-spirited, violent, and insecure. Though the only married man on the ranch, he’s extremely jealous and suspicious of his wife, and he tends to overcompensate for his lack of height by picking fights with larger men. Curley cares most about looking strong.

Curley’s Wife – The only female character in the novel, and Curley’s wife. The men on the ranch call her a “tart” because she flirts with them. They consider her dangerous because her attention might cause them to get fired, or worse. But beneath her sexy exterior, Curley’s wife is deeply lonely, and has dashed dreams of her own.

Slim – A skilled mule driver with an ageless face, a grave manner, and a calm authority on how to run a ranch, Slim is a revered figure on the ranch. As the most self-assured of the men, he is the only one who never takes a swipe at anyone else in order to make himself feel stronger or better. At the same time, he is also the only one of the ranch hands who truly understands and appreciates the power and purity of the friendship between George and Lennie.

Crooks – The stable manager, and the only black man on the farm. Crooks’ name comes from his crooked posture, the result of a kick from a horse. Crooks is bitter from a lifetime of lonely segregation. He thinks of himself as a cynic, and immediately sees that George and Lennie’s dream of owning a farm will never come about. Yet at the same time, he can’t entirely resist the beauty of the dream, and wants to be a part of it.

Carlson – The ranch-hand who shoots Candy’s dog in the back of the head. Though he isn’t cruel, Carlson is without sentimentality, and has no qualms about killing or getting rid of anything that’s no longer useful.

The Boss – The man who runs the ranch, and Curley’s father. He is quick to anger and suspicion, but is otherwise fair. Like his son, the boss wears fancy boots to show that he occupies a station above the ranch hands.

Aunt Clara – Though not an actual character in the novel, Aunt Clara cared for Lennie until her death. She appears to Lennie in a vision near the end of the novel.

Whit – A ranch hand.

Andy Cushman – A childhood friend of George and Lennie’s who is in prison “on account of a tart.”

Of Mice and Men takes its title from a famous lyric by the Scottish poet Robert Burns (1759 - 1796). Burns’s poem “To a Mouse” contains the lines, “The best laid plans of mice and men / Often go awry.” Nearly all of the main characters Of Mice and Men harbor dreams and plans that never come true. Most notably, George, Lennie, and Candy share a doomed dream of buying their own farm and living off the land. George often laments the life he could have had as a freewheeling bachelor, free of the burden of caring for Lennie. “[i]f I was alone I could live so easy,” he says, Lennie has his own private dream of living in a cave with his own rabbits, while Curley’s wife often regrets her missed chance to become a Hollywood actress. In the end, the novel’s main theme is that people must learn to reconcile their dreams with reality, to accept that everyone’s best laid plans often perish. These plans “go awry” not because the characters in the novella give up on them, but because forces beyond their control destroy them. In the bleak economic outlook of the Great Depression, during which the novel was written and set, coming to terms with dreams broken by out-of-control economic forces became a reality nearly everyone in America faced.

THE AMERICAN DREAM

The American Dream is written into the Declaration of Independence: “life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.” Lennie and George’s dream of owning a farm and living off the “fatta the lan’” symbolizes this dream. Of Mice and Men shows that for poor migrant workers during the Depression, the American Dream became an illusion and a trap. All the ranch hands in Of Mice and Men dream of life, liberty, and happiness, but none ever gets it. As Crooks says when he hears of Lennie’s dream to own his own farm, “Nobody ever gets to heaven, and nobody gets no land!”

At the same time, while the dream may never be realized, Of Mice and Men suggests that in order for life to be full and meaningful, it must contain dreams. George and Lennie never achieve their dream, but the dream holds their remarkable friendship together. Their dream is real because it’s real in their imaginations. The dream keeps Lennie happy and stops George from becoming “mean” and lonely like most ranch hands. The dream gives them life, even if life never allows them to achieve their dreams.

MALE FRIENDSHIP

Of Mice and Men explores the dynamics of male friendship. When Lennie asks George to tell him why they’re not like other ranchers, George explains that they’re different because they have each other. Usually ranchers have no family, no friends, and, therefore, no future. George and Lennie’s friendship strikes the other ranch workers as odd; their dependence on each other makes the boss and Curley suspicious; and Slim observes that ranch workers rarely travel together because they’re scared of each other. Although most of the men in the novel are entirely alone, they all crave true companionship. As Crooks, perhaps the novel’s most solitary character because of his black skin, puts it, “A guy needs somebody—to be near him.”

THE WEAK AND THE STRONG

Though many characters in Of Mice and Men long for friendship and compassion, they live in fear of each other. As Carlson’s unsentimental shooting of Candy’s dog makes clear, in the Great Depression the useless, old, or weak were inevitably destroyed as the strong and useful fought for survival. Everyone on the ranch constantly tries to look strong, especially if they feel weak. The fear of the weak being overrun by the strong explains why Curley likes to fight larger men, why Crooks tells Lennie that George is going to abandon him, and why Curley’s wife threatens to have Crooks lynched. Each character tries to appear strong by asserting power over another. The fear of the strong also explains why most of the other characters in Of Mice and Men can’t comprehend Lennie and George’s friendship. A human relationship devoid of power dynamics simply makes no sense to the other characters, all of whom assume they’re in a fight for survival.

WOMEN

There are two different visions of women in Of Mice and Men: the male characters’ view of women, and the novel’s view of women. The men tend to view women with scorn and fear, dismissing women as dangerous sexual temptresses. Women are often referred to as “tarts,” a derogatory word for women that means “tramp.” Lennie and George have a mutual friend in prison “on account of a tart,” and their own troubles result twice from the enticing allure of a woman—the woman in Weeds, and Curley’s wife. Yet although Curley’s wife plays into her role as sexy temptress, Of Mice and Men presents her, at least partly, as a victim. She craves the attention of the men because she’s desperately lonely, and flaunts her power over the men because she herself feels weak. Similarly, the novella’s portrayal of Aunt Clara as a vision of wholesome femininity from a more innocent age contrasts with the male characters’ consistently negative view of women.
GEORGE AND LENNIE'S FARM

The farm George and Lennie hope to own is a symbol of the American Dream. Like a mirage, the farm leads George, Lennie, and other ranchers like Candy and Crooks, to indulge in the dream of living “off the fatta the lan.” George’s elaborate description of the farm’s abundant plants and animals also makes it seem like a symbol of paradise.

RABBITS

Lennie’s dream is to tend the rabbits on the farm that he and George hope to one day own. This dream establishes Lennie’s complete innocence. But Lennie loves the rabbits because of their soft fur, and his love of touching soft things leads to his doom. The rabbits, then, symbolize not only innocence, but also the downfall of innocence in a harsh world.

CANDY’S DOG

Candy’s once powerful sheepdog is now old and useless. Carlson’s killing of the dog makes it clear that during the Depression only the strong survive. The way in which Carlson kills the dog—with a gunshot to the back of the head—foreshadows Lennie’s death and likens Lennie to Candy’s dog: they’re both powerless, innocent, and doomed.

LENNIE’S PUPPY

Just as Lennie is dependent on George, Lennie’s puppy is entirely dependent on Lennie. Like Lennie, the puppy symbolizes the fate of the weak in the face of the strong.

PART 1 QUOTES

Slowly, like a terrier who doesn’t want to bring a ball to its master, Lennie approached, drew back, approached again.

Well, we ain’t got any,’ George exploded. ‘Whatever we ain’t got, that’s what you want. God a mighty, if I was alone I could live so easy. I could go get a job an’ work, an’ no trouble....An’ whatta I got,’ George went on furiously. ‘I got you! You can’t keep a job and you lose me ever’ job I get. Jus’ keep me shovin’ all over the country all the time. An’ that ain’t the worst. You get in trouble. You do bad things and I got to get you out.

Guys like us, that work on ranches, are the loneliest guys in the world. They got no family. They don’t belong no place....With us it ain’t like that. We got a future.... An’ why? Because...because I got you to look after me, and you got me to look after you, and that’s why.

“Well,” said George, “we’ll have a big vegetable patch and a rabbit hutch and chickens. And when it rains in the winter, we’ll just say the hell with goin’ to work, and we’ll build up a fire in the stove and set around it an’ listen to the rain comin’ down on the roof.”

“Ain’t many guys travel around together,” he mused. “I don’t know why. Maybe ever’body in the whole damn world is scared of each other.”

PART 2

“Carl’s right, Candy. That dog ain’t no good to himself. I wisht somebody’d shoot me if I got old an’ a cripple.”

You seen what they done to my dog tonight? They says he wasn’t no good to himself nor nobody else. When they can me here I wisht somebody’d shoot me. But they won’t do nothing like that.

“We could live offa the fatta the lan.”

S’pose they was a carnival or a circus come to town, or a ball game, or any damn thing.” Old Candy nodded in appreciation of the idea. “We’d just go to her,” George said. “We wouldn’t ask nobody if we could. Jus’ say, ‘We’ll go to her,’ an’ we would. Jus’ milk the cow and sling some grain to the chickens an’ go to her.

I ought to of shot that dog myself, George. I shouldn’t ought to of let no stranger shoot my dog.

PART 3 QUOTES

“A guy needs somebody—to be near him.’ He whined, ‘A guy goes nuts if he ain’t got nobody.’

I seen hundreds of men come by on the road an’ on the ranches, with their bindles on their back an’ that same damn thing in their heads...every damn one of ‘em’s got a little piece of land in his head. An’ never a God damn one of ’em ever gets it. Just like heaven. Ever’body wants a little piece of lan’; I read plenty of books out here. Nobody never gets to heaven, and nobody gets no land.

PART 4 QUOTES

I seen it over an’ over—a guy talkin’ to another guy and it don’t make no difference if he don’t hear or understand. The thing is, they’re talkin’, or they’re settin’ still not talkin’. It don’t make no difference, no difference....It’s just the talking.

“A guy sets alone out here at night, maybe readin’ books or thinkin’ or stuff like that. Sometimes he gets thinkin’, an’ he got nothing to tell him what’s so an’ what ain’t so. Maybe if he sees somethin’, he don’t know whether it’s right or not. He can’t turn to some other guy and ast him if he sees it too. He can’t tell. He got nothing to measure by. I seen things out here. I wasn’t drunk. I don’t know if I was asleep. If some guy was with me, he could tell me I was asleep, an’ then it would be all right. But I jus’ don’t know.

PART 5 QUOTES

Why can’t I talk to you? I never get to talk to nobody. I get awful lonely.
George and Lennie's denim clothing show that they're poor ranch hands. Their single-file walking pattern reveals the dynamics of their relationship: George is the leader even though Lennie is larger.

Lennie's lack of common sense is the first indication of his mental disability.

George clearly acts as a kind of parent to Lennie. Petting the mouse shows Lennie's innocence and the unintended consequences of his strength.

George constantly worries that Lennie's disability will jeopardize their welfare and their future.

PART 2

George and Lennie arrive at the ranch the next morning. At the bunkhouse, an old man with no right hand and a crippled dog greets them. His name is Candy. He says the boss was angry when they didn't show up last night.

The bunkhouse is a place inhabited by single, lonely men. Candy is a man broken by life and the Depression, dependent on the kindness of the Boss.
The boss enters. George blames the bus driver for their lateness. When the boss asks about their skills, George speaks for Lennie. The boss gets suspicious when Lennie repeats something George says.

The boss has never seen a man go out of his way for another man like George does for Lennie, and suspects that George might be taking advantage of Lennie. George lies, and says that Lennie is his cousin. The boss is still suspicious, but lets them stay.

After the boss leaves, Lennie asks George if what he said was true. George says they were just lies, and notices that Candy has been listening to their conversation. He tells Candy to mind his own business. Candy assures him he wasn’t eavesdropping.

Curley, the boss’s son, enters, looking for his father. Curley, who wears fancy boots, quickly starts picking on Lennie, who refuses to speak. After Curley leaves, Candy says Curley is a lightweight boxer and has a history of picking fights with men larger than him.

Candy adds that Curley has only gotten worse since his recent marriage to a pretty “tart” who flirts with the ranch hands. Candy also reveals that Curley keeps vaseline in his left glove to keep his fingers soft.

When Candy leaves, George tells Lennie to stay away from Curley. Fighting with Curley, he warns, will get them fired. Candy promises. George again tells Lennie to hide and wait for George in the bushes by the river if he ever gets into trouble at the ranch.

Just then, Curley’s wife enters. She is very pretty and wears a lot of makeup. While asking where his dog is, Curley, who refuses to speak, enters again, looking for his dog. Carlson proposes shooting the puppies, but that he had to drown four puppies because there wasn’t enough food for them all. Carlson proposes shooting Candy’s crippled dog and replacing it with one of the puppies. Lennie wonders if he can get a puppy of his own.

Curley enters again, looking for his wife. When he leaves, George says he might end up in a fight with Curley himself. The triangle rings, signalling that it’s time for dinner.

PART 3

Slim agrees to give Lennie a puppy. When George thanks him, Slim says Lennie is the best worker he’s ever seen even though he’s “cuckoo.” George defends Lennie, and Slim again admires George and Lennie’s friendship.

George explains that he grew up with Lennie and took care of him after his Aunt Clara died. George admits that at first he took advantage of Lennie’s willingness to do whatever he told him, but soon felt ashamed and since then has taken good care of him. He adds that having Lennie as his companion keeps him from getting “mean,” as most ranch workers do.

George also tells Slim what happened in Weed. Lennie touched a woman’s dress. She objected. He panicked and wouldn’t let go. The woman claimed it was rape, and Lennie and George had to flee a mob.

Lennie enters with his puppy under his coat. George orders him to return the puppy to its litter. While Lennie is gone, Candy and his crippled dog enter the bunkhouse, followed by Carlson. Carlson again suggests they put the dog out of its misery. Slim agrees and offers Candy one of his puppies.

Whit enters, holding a magazine containing a letter to the editor from a ranch hand they once knew. Meanwhile, Carlson persuades Candy to let him shoot the dog. He takes the dog outside. As the men play cards, a shot fires. Candy stares at the wall.

On the ranch during the Depression, the men believe killing the weak protects the weak from prolonged suffering. While killing is therefore seen as mercy, it also means that if you want to live it’s crucial that you seem strong.

Curley’s wariness about his wife makes George uneasy: he foresees trouble.

Lennie and George’s earlier trouble stems from Lennie’s innocent love of soft things and a woman’s false accusation of rape.

Slim and Carlson can’t imagine that Candy has an emotional attachment to his dog, so they can’t comprehend that killing the dog would pain him.

The “mercy” killing of Candy’s dog shows how the strong destroy the weak on the ranch. The killing also foreshadows future events.

PART 4

Crooks, whose nickname stems from his crooked back, sits on his bunk in the stable. Lennie stops by Crooks' room, but Crooks demands he leave. Crooks shouts that if he's not allowed in the white men's quarters, then the white men aren't allowed in his. But Lennie's innocent loneliness (all the other men have gone into town to visit a brothel) wins Crooks over.

As they talk, Lennie forgets the farm is a secret and mentions it. Crooks thinks this just one of Lennie's fantasies.

Crooks makes himself feel strong by making Lennie feel weaker.

George again predicts that Curley's wife will cause trouble. He views all women as temptresses. And he implies that women might interfere with his dream of buying a farm with Lennie.

Curley's insecurity about his wife leads him to mistake Lennie's heartfelt smile for a taunt, and to try to save face by showing he's stronger than Lennie. This suggests that Lennie and George's dream will lead unintentionally to trouble.

This moment may be the most hopeful in the novel. The men have rallied around George and Lennie. Their dream seems achievable.

PART 5

On Sunday, Lennie sits in the barn stroking his puppy, which is dead. He fears this means he won't be allowed to tend the rabbits. He throws the puppy away, then retrieves it and starts stroking it again.

The dead puppy is an ominous sign. Once again, Lennie's innocent strength has created accidental tragedy.
Curley’s wife enters. Lennie tells her he's not allowed to talk to her, but she says no one will ever know. She notices the dead puppy and consoles him, then explains that she almost became a movie actress, but her plans were thwarted by her mother and a bad talent agent. She says she doesn't even like Curley. Like the men on the ranch, Curley’s wife also suffers from lack of love and attention, and also from having sacrificed her plans and dreams for Curley. A moment of connection between Lennie and Curley’s wife ends in tragedy. Just as he killed his puppy, Lennie kills her, and his dream.

Lennie is referring to the events in Weed.

Lennie stopped George from growing ‘mean’ because his belief in their dream made George believe it too. Now George is doomed to live a lonely rancher’s life. Candy cries for the death of the dream that had saved him, for a while, from hopelessness. George, meanwhile, protects himself.

Candy enters and finds Curley’s wife’s body. He runs and gets George, and the two of them realize that Curley will lynch Lennie. Candy then asks if the plan to buy the farm is now officially off. George says he never really thought it would happen, but Lennie believed in it so much he had started to as well.

Fearing Curley will think he had something to do with the murder, George tells Candy to pretend George never saw the body. George leaves. Candy curses at Curley’s wife’s body. He cries, then goes to alert the men.

PART 6

Hiding in the brush by the river, Lennie has a vision of his Aunt Clara, who tells him George would have had a much easier life without him. Lennie then has a hallucination of a giant rabbit, which tells him George will abandon him.

George shows up. He is quiet and not angry. Lennie begs George to yell at him. George does, but he shows no real anger. Lennie offers to go live in a cave, and George, as usual, tells him not to.

Lennie then asks George to describe their farm. George does, and tells Lennie to take off his hat and to look out over the river and try to imagine the farm. As Lennie happily says they should buy the farm now, George lifts Carlson’s gun and shoots Lennie in the back of the head.

The other men hear the gun shot. George tells Carlson that Lennie had his gun and that he shot him after wrestling it away from him. Slim leads the distraught George away, repeating over and over that George had to do it. Carlson and Curley can’t figure out what’s “eatin'” George and Slim.

Lennie understands the destructive consequences of his actions on his friendship and dream. The things he holds most dear condemn him.

In this terrible moment, Lennie wants to act as if everything is normal. George plays along.

George takes Candy’s advice: he makes sure Lennie dies at the hand of someone he loves while imagining the unattainable dream that made his life meaningful.

Men like Carlson and Curley have no understanding of the friendship that can exist between men. Slim and George do, because of Lennie. That is the legacy of Lennie’s dream.
